The week in politics brought forth some indications that the politicians much they are going to let the people share in that event.

much they are going to let the people share in that event.

David Lawrence, a syndicate writer, comes out with a prediction that McAdoo will be nominated by the Democrats, Lowden by the Republicans, and Johnson will be nominated by the Independents, and that will make a free for all three cornered fight. He may be right about it, but we do not see any very strong signs of a third party. The 1912 fiasco is too recent in the political mind to encourage the insurgents. The election machinery does not lend itself to the formation of third parties.

In 1755, civilization in Virginia, was one hundred and forty nine years old. It was a powerful and thriving empire. It looked back to the days of the first settlers as a more remote time than we today look back to the days of the Revolutionary war which to all intents and purposes is as far back as the beginning of the Christian era. It was at this time that the closest attention to all news of it. There was one Indian, a Delaware, who could talk English, and he told the boy of the progress that the army was making. That Braddock's army was advancing in very close order and that the Indians would surround the Indians with the Indians would surround the Indians with the Indians with Indians was a dopted as a member of the Indians was adopted with the Indians for four years and a Indi to the formation of third parties.
